Children use their senses to learn

Each child learns differently. What they feel, hear, see, touch and smell affect how they learn and how much they learn. Movement and body position are also big parts of learning.

What's so great about movement?

Movement is the foundation from which all other skills develop. It is through movement that a child develops trunk stability, body awareness, bilateral integration, balance and mastery of the environment.

Once these foundation skills are developed then a child can improve his/her eye-hand coordination, ocular-motor control, motor planning, hand development, visual-perceptual and fine motor skills.

With these skills in place, attention, language, daily living activities and academic learning can take place.

Movement stimulates the vestibular system and auditory nerves, which in turn stimulates speech. While participating in movement activities children tend to use more language.
